I spend a lot of my day communicating: email, phone, meetings, you name it. I am ON all day. When I get home, I unwind by playing my guitar. It's my way of tuning out the world for a little while or processing something that happened during the day. My playing often reflects what I'm feeling. Sometimes I'll even write a song on the spot about a piece of my day. I call it my guitar therapy.

I have this mountain of books on my nightstand. I'm always reading something and even though I finish a few books a month, that stack never seems to get smaller. Friends and clients recommend books to me, so on to the pile they go. Novels, memoirs, history – I read it all. It's a way for me to disconnect from the hurried pace of my days and get a new perspective on my world.

I grew up on a lake and have tried just about any sport having to do with water. Lately, I've spent a lot of time kayaking by myself. I'll go out in practically any type of weather. And even though I paddle in the same waters, I always see something new. It's important to me to turn to a hobby that's physical as a balance to the many hours I spend at a computer or on my phone. I get a good workout in and a chance to turn off work for a while.
